In one type of thermal inkjet printing, a heater, located at a nub or at the printhead, is used to heat ink to create vapor bubble in the ink. The vapor bubble then ejects an ink droplet onto a print medium. In this way, the heater is utilized both for heating ink and for causing the ink droplet ejection. One difficulty with conventional thermal inkjet printing, however, is that current thermal inkjet printheads are only capable of ejecting ink of one color. This limits the possible colors of an image, since inkjet printers require ink of more than one color for creating a
