If you own any other version of Band of Drones you can easily transfer your progress to Band of Drones Elite Force! The following list describes the features and mechanics of the main game. Campaign The original Band of Drones campaign is set in the Crixius sector, the core of the game. As of the version 1.0.0, the campaign features 4 scenarios: Plunder, Blast, Siege, Resistance. Each mission begins with a briefing screen in which you get to select three out of your 12 drones and their class, then an overview of the mission you are about to play. The mission ends after either you or the enemy are eliminated. The closer you are to the enemy score, the higher the explosion factor. This reflects how much damage your drones did, and how much damage was caused by the enemy. The drones are placed at the center of the map and arranged in a hexagonal shape. Each hexagon contains exactly 6 drones. The game tracks the drones' power and ammo levels, giving you a number of reinforcements. These are placed in a special reserve box, and can be used during a mission. Each unit has a set of unique abilities that makes them better in certain circumstances. All you have to do is to decide which of these you want to use based on the situation and the enemy drones. A drone can take on its chosen ability once it is called. Power-

"Black Lazar is a gripping thriller in the vein of "Thief" and "The Talos Principle." Indeed, the next-gen dark fantasy adventure does not just ask questions but reveals the answers. In this game, where every choice has a consequence, everything is a matter of point of view." -Ludius, 1UP.com Story (skip to the "Download" section for direct access) Chapter 1 I was gazing at it for a long time - the orb, the source of all three of the civilizations that I knew had come from. people who had built that temple. But I was very afraid and would not stop living there, always hiding and watching, moving only at night when I was sure no one was watching me. At the age of 17, I gained enough courage to commit the necessary deed. I crept there one night in the process of doing this, using my pick and shovel to hide the fact that I was digging a hole. I chiseled the rock away from one of the columns of the temple, and made my way inside. And there, staring at me, was an unknown writing. I used the torch in my bag to take a better look at it, and read the words on the wall. "From here I was going to build the Tower of Souls and the Temple of Souls." Chapter 2 After I returned to the surface and had told the elders what I had seen there, we built a shrine in one of the main temples to express our gratitude to whoever had been looking after us. I made the plans, and later, when I'd completed them, I put them in a briefcase and buried them. For almost a year I did not think of them again. Then one day, when I was going down to the cattle drive with the elders, I forgot my briefcase in a corner of the main temple. The head elder scolded me, saying that it was not our custom to leave anything on the temple grounds - but he did not take the briefcase. That evening, I went back to where I had left it, to discover that the briefcase had disappeared. But the longer I thought about this, the less convinced I was that the elders had taken it. Someone must have seen me bury it, someone must have read the plans. I was thoroughly

Please select from Pacific Surfliner DLC from the web site list to play this DLC scenario and add it to the Steam Cloud if you haven't done so already. GAMEPLAY: The people of the Pacific Surfliner have vanished into thin air, leaving behind a number of passengers in a time capsule. The time capsule slowly ticks down as the players, as a small group of scientists, trace the history of the Pacific Surfliner, a glorified old-fashioned passenger train that plunges off the edge of the map, down into the desert below. The passengers include a number of the ruling classes of California, Californian crook John Breckenridge, criminal inventor Edward Wilkes and criminal informer William Wilson. The train was invented to help transport the aristocrats and the rich from the manicured spires of the east, to the untamed golden desert west, to experience the vastness and beauty of the west in an old-fashioned, leisurely journey. Yet, like any good train, the Pacific Surfliner was more than just a place for the wealthy to take a holiday in the desert, where they could reconnect with nature and the large industries like that of the oil and the gold mining in the west, where the train was headquartered. It was also used to transport criminal masterminds and spies across the Pacific, to dig up and transport stolen property, and to destroy them far out in the desert and bury them without ever being discovered. In other words, it is filled to the brim with secrets. There are three chapters in the Pacific Surfliner scenario and five levels, each with its own set of passengers and enemies. In the end, the goal is to avoid ending up in the disturbing conclusion, which is the end of the railroad and the travelers, who had spent a pleasant vacation on the Pacific Surfliner, received their true fate in the desert below. The Pacific Surfliner scenario uses a new gameplay model in which the game features optional pre-set scenarios and random elements, while being open to the end of game conditions. The "Longshot" feature allows the player to attempt to remain in the game for the whole scenario. The "conqueror" feature allows the players to win the entire scenario. While these features enhance the replayability and randomized nature of the game, the "Pacific Surfliner" scenario uses all these optional features, which does not give rise to a streamlined experience. Furthermore, the "Pacific Surfliner" scenario does not feature tutorials,
