Key Game Features:

In Guns'n'Stories, you and your shooter buddy have to defend your data against a relentless Colonel and his robotic army. The problem is that the Colonel isn't going to let you destroy his brain until you have a firm grasp on the most recent Big Data files for his personal collection. Don't get distracted.

This is a first-person shooter with bullet-time. You need to shoot the Colonel's robots in the head, so that the Colonel can't record your Big Data files.

But don't worry, your Colt Python and your partner's New Way In are your best bets for defense. This unlikely duo has been hand-picked by the Colonel's personal librarian, with hands that know how to hold a weapon.

The Colonel's robots attack rapidly one after the other, and only a quick shot will save the day. If you fall for some reason, a sneaky robot will finish the mission and you'll have to start again. There is no rest for the best.

Fortunately, big sites like and have generously provided me with the latest Big Data files and my robot-killing partner is ready for round two. Download your buddy and let's go.

just accidentally released one of the best games of 2016 Is it a true vacation? It's actually a violent, exciting, dirty, sexy trip in a time machine, a CGI fantasy for dementia patients. A hallucinatory, as futuristic as it is ageless. In the French words of game designer François Pacaud, "A cinéma de science-fiction!" An orphan at the age of seven, Pacaud is one of the most respected directors of French video games. But the man who talks about VR as his "decisive" and "revolutionary" project is someone else: Hugo, a 24-year-old from Chicago named Matt Webster, who is playing one of the six candidate games that make up the future of video games but focuses on playing only real video games. He is devastated that Bulletproof VR doesn't work. Matt counts his blessings that he gets to try Bulletproof VR first, even if it was a first attempt. "Funny you say that," he says. "I was just thinking the other day, there's 10 developers in the room and to see them all working together, doing something new together, all the risks they're taking, and 10 years from now if these guys are still making games, I'm not sure about anyone else in that room." The developers had just put into Bulletproof VR a feature called "commotion," which wraps around Bulletproof VR to let you share the experience and shoot from the hip. It works, but it's not ready. Hugo talks over the headset so the developers know that he can hear them, but he can't talk to them, and it's not possible to tell what they're doing or say. The idea of what he's doing is starting to come into focus. Matt is playing the same level, level 1-2, over and over. It's his first time in VR, a first for the team. He rides a train with Felix Gleixner, Félix Sáenz de Lera, and Louis-Philippe Bonnet, the guys who were the first full time VR developers at Ubisoft. Hugo is on the floor next to him, staring at his feet and foot controls floating at the end of his arms. The game is designed so that every game you play, to a degree, becomes training for the next level. "There is a select
