Effectiveness of a participatory process to reduce healthcare disparities. This article describes the effectiveness of a community-based participatory intervention designed to reduce disparities in care by evaluating the outcomes of an intervention that provided health education, supported exercise participation, supported a home food assessment, and provided transportation to medical appointments. The outcomes of the program were compared among participants and nonparticipants using a repeated measures design. Participants demonstrated significant decreases in body mass index and waist circumference and significant improvements in several self-reported measures of health at baseline and follow-up compared with nonparticipants. Participants were also more likely to have had a mammogram and a general dentist appointment in the last year compared with nonparticipants. The study demonstrates the feasibility and effectiveness of community-based participatory interventions to reduce health disparities. In addition, it suggests that community-based participatory interventions can be used to promote health while also serving the important goal of reducing disparities in care.

IBM has acquired security company Unisys, a deal that will let the enterprise hardware giant use the code of the original developer of the Secure Sockets Layer (SSL) protocol, the trusted security protocol used to secure e-commerce transactions. The specific collaboration is only with Unisys' Trusteer division. All IBM customers can use Trusteer's SSL compliance management platform, which includes the TrustCenter SSL solution, for compliance, risk mitigation, and fraud detection. The deal allows IBM to acquire Trusteer's SSL compliance solutions and the companies will continue to operate separately. Trusteer makes a product called TrustCenter Endpoint that helps enterprises prevent phishing attacks, which are commonly used by fraudsters to steal bank and credit card account information. The TrustCenter Endpoint platform integrates with IBM's WebSphere Security solution, which is a managed security solution for many IT environments. IBM and Trusteer are not the first to have integrated a company into an SSL stack.
