Survivin immunoreactivity is associated with impaired progression-free survival in small cell lung cancer: relationship with prognostic factors and treatment. Survivin is a protein of unique structure with a central region that contains the baculoviral inhibitor of apoptosis repeat and a C-terminal alpha-helical coiled-coil, giving it unique properties. It is normally expressed only in normal germinal tissues and in certain hematopoietic malignancies. This study examined the immunohistochemical localization of survivin in a variety of solid tumors, with special attention to small cell lung cancer (SCLC), in order to determine whether it might be of prognostic significance. The expression of survivin was assessed in 96 small cell lung cancer (SCLC) cases and correlated with well-established prognostic factors and the response to treatment. There were no survivin protein staining (n = 95) or moderate (n = 1) or strong (n = 1) protein expression in normal lung tissues. Survivin protein was immunolocalized in only 30% (29/96) of small cell lung cancer cases. Survivin expression was associated with male gender (P = 0.004), younger age (P = 0.04), limited stage disease (P = 0.006), positive mediastinal node metastases (P = 0.02), absence of adenocarcinoma (P = 0.04), and absence of squamous cell carcinoma (P = 0.03). In univariate analysis, positive survivin expression was associated with an unfavorable survival. In multivariate analysis, only the absence of
